Since I spend most of my time working on a Mac, I prefer OS-specific settings. However, each project in Lightroom only has one set of settings. If you move a project to a new machine or to a new computer, not all settings will be available. Also, Lightroom's interface is intentionally vague to ease the learning experience. There are no file type- or quality-specific tools and no real way to make different settings for international, web, or print projects. There's a wonderful trick in Photoshop that shows a way of doing multiple adjustments. Select an area in your image and then use the Adjustment Panel to add shadows, highlights, or a vignette to the selected area. You can also add highlights, shadows, grain, and noise reduction, as well as soften, sharpen, blur, and tilt your image. Once done, click OK to apply the changes, and you can then do similar adjustments to another area - one without the settings selections. Of course, those settings can be applied to any layer, so you can save them as a preset which you can then assign to any number of areas in your project. This saves you the hassle of having to make dedicated adjustments to each layer. The Ink Drop feature lets you add ink color, exposure, and perspective corrections to your images. You could also add modeling tweaks like dust/scratches or blemishes. Instead of marking a color in the HSB color space, you mark an ink drop. It's even possible to add key lines to a file, and the software will create a corresponding black/white line in the image.
